The world bestowed a wealth of biodiversity, rainforests, waterfalls, and sublime coastlines to Quepos, Costa Rica. Named for the native Quepoa Indians who inhabited the area in the colonial era, Quepos is quite the natural wonder. Only ten degrees north of the equator, the city also champions the Pacific Ocean to its west and the Caribbean Sea to its east. Such prime coordinates provide a veritable sanctuary for outdoors enthusiasts.

THE CITY

kmf164/Flickr (image cropped)

Quepos is located on Costa Rica's central Pacific coast and is the gateway to a popular National Park and several beaches. The city center has many restaurants, bars, bakeries, art galleries, and gift shops. Its citizens love life, celebrating it with a month-long party where the streets overflow with dancers, concerts, parades and street carnivals every February. This cozy beach community is a great destination for an adventurous and fun-filled vacation.

DO & SEE

Guanlong D./Flickr (image cropped)

Passport / Visa

Citizens of the European Union as well as Australia, New Zealand, North America, and most countries in South America do not require a visa to visit Costa Rica. Visitors with a valid, multiple-entry visa or residence permit issued by any country of the European Union, Canada or the United States can also visit without a visa, for a stay of 30 days maximum. Requirements for other visitors depend on their nationality, and are best checked with your local consulate.

Best Time to Visit

The winter months going from December to March are characterized by a low chance of precipitation, a warm climate and low humidity, making it the best season for outdoor activities. That is also what makes it one of the busiest tourist-wise.

The fall and spring seasons, on the contrary, feature a lower amount of tourists, but this is due to the higher likelihood of rain. If you don't particularly mind the rain and the often overcast weather, this is a good period to visit Quepos.
